You also looked at what you need to know when choosing a blender during Black Friday sales, making the right decision. The best Black Friday blender deals on How to choose a blender with so many great Black Friday blenders dealing there, it can be intimidating to know where to start. A reasonable rule of thumb is to know your budget and stick to it. Don't spend too much. Once you know your budget, we recommend checking out the best blenders guide so you know exactly which one is best for the bunch. The best brand overall is Blendtec designer series blenders, but that doesn't necessarily mean it's the perfect choice for you. One aspect of how quiet you need your blender to be. Usually the more powerful the engine, the more so, but it is not always the same. Something like the Breville Super Q Blender is a good call that's pretty quiet yet powerful. In connection with this, not all blenders are equally strong. Check your energy coding to see how easily you'll be able to slice and dice. If you simply need a blender with the basics, you won't have to worry about high performance reviews. If you need a blender that has pure root vegetables, however, you'll want to aim high. If you have limited space, it's worth making sure you don't buy too much blender. Something like Ninja Master Prep Professional range is large in size, while still super useful for making smoothies, soups, or sauces. Depending on your needs, your personal blender can do the job just fine if you simply want to blend down some vegetables and fruits into your individual smoothies. Finally, some blenders offer a wide range of programmable features. This can be super useful if you want to step away and let this work for you, but it's not relevant. Alternatively, if you want to be completely practical, you don't need these features, so it's not worth paying for the extra. Some programmed settings can be useful, but you don't have to overdo it. How much to spend on a blender on Black Friday? Whether you have a budget of $25 or $2,500, you can find blenders that are in the price range. There is no shortage of blender choices for sure, but how much to spend? As always, considering your budget and what you can afford and want to spend, the most important aspect in choosing a blender is how you will use it. If you want a tool to make smoothies that consists of a variety of liquids in small quantities, a sub-$50 personal blender is a good choice. If you're going to add solids, including hard veggies like kale, to your smoothie recipe, you'll need more energy, possibly a lot more energy. You can find moderately strong blenders for $50 to $100, but if Going to seriously create smoothies, you might want to consider premium blenders brands like Vitamix and Blendtec. A prime example is Vitamix Vitamix Ascent Series Professional-Grade Smart Blender for sale on Amazon. Both brands sell a range of high-performance models, priced from $200-ish to $500 to $700. Another choice is to buy a combined blender/food processor or blender/juicer, again with price tags that start at $200 and so upwards. Are any Black Friday blender deals too good to be true? Most Black Friday blender offers offer fabulous savings, but you still need to be diligent when shopping. Retailers use Black Friday to sell the latest and largest products at super prices, but often sell older and slower-moving inventory during Black Friday. Every Black Friday deal isn't necessarily a good buy.
